

Picklists are lists of standardized terms for court orders.

Picklists are available on courtroom computers so a court clerk can use them to quickly and accurately capture the order a judge makes. When a judge decides to change the standard wording, a court clerk can edit the term accordingly. Picklists include number codes that help the court clerk find a term quickly. When a judge says a number before making an order, they are helping the clerk find that order.

For example you might hear a judge say "1106". This lets the court clerk know that the judge is referring to a term that says "You must attend each court appearance unless this Court excuses you."

These picklists may be used in all BC Provincial Court locations, but local variations of "Red Zone" conditions are available for Vancouver, Victoria, Surrey and Kelowna. "Red Zone" is a common term used to describe areas that people may be prohibited from entering by bail, probation or conditional sentence orders.
